KAREN FOLEY: Join me on the 11th of March, when I’ll be discussing the importance of research with colleagues from the Faculty of Arts and Social Sciences at The Open University. We’ll focus on the theme of belonging and consider how beauty, art, technology, and inequalities play a part in who belongs and what they belong to.

In our interdisciplinary discussions, we’ll explore how people create and experience a sense of belonging and some of the barriers that prevent people from being a part of a group. These are all themes that play an important part in our teaching. And of course, they’re issues that we can all relate to.

The Student Hub Live is The Open University’s online, live interactive platform. And anyone is welcome to join at any point in the programme. At these events, you can watch the discussion in the studio, talk to others in the chat, and share your own views.

If you have a question you’d like to ask in advance, then just email us. And if you can’t attend on the day, you can catch up afterwards. It’s going to be a great event. And I really hope that you can join me then.
