KAREN FOLEY: At The Open University, on the 1st of April, we're hosting a live online interactive broadcast celebrating the study of the classical world. Our Classical Studies lecturers are teaming up with the Advocating Classics Education project, or ACE, which promotes and supports the study of classical civilization and ancient history in secondary schools across the UK.

The event is primarily aimed at school groups and their teachers. But the Livestream programme is open to all. We've invited a live studio audience from Redborne Upper School and Community College, just down the road from us here in Milton Keynes. But we're equally delighted to welcome you, our remote audience, to get involved with the interactive afternoon of Classical Studies.

If you join us on the day, you'll learn about how ancient wisdom can change your life, with Professor Edith Hall, author of Aristotle's Way and other books about the ancient Greeks. Other OU classicists will present talks on various classical subjects, from Greek drama to ancient religion. And you'll also find out what Classical Studies has to offer at school and university level.

To find out more about the programme and to join the event when it's live, visit the website.

[MUSIC PLAYING]